see how much the war has costs us put this in ur webpage

```
<center>
<!-- include cost of war javascript; this runs the counter -->
<script language="JavaScript" src="http://costofwar.com/costofwar.js"></script>
<!-- the elements 'row' and 'alt' will be changed by the javascript to contain the correct numbers -->
Cost of the War in Iraq
(JavaScript Error)
To see more details, click here.
<!-- this line triggers the counter to start -->
<script language="JavaScript"> inc_totals_at_rate(1000);
</script>
</center>

It might as well be 192 trillion. When you're tweaked over so far to the right that it hurts, debts and price tags aren't a priority... and generally never are or will be.

It's nice that America doesn't care how much it costs to unleash a coup d'etats in a country that badly needed it for reasons that don't even matter anymore because they've mutated so drastically over the last couple of years that their basis is strictly morality alone. I just hope that America is willing to do that to other countries in the same way they claim they did it in Iraq... only this time not years after the matter of fact and before the initial justification blows up morbidly in their face.

I mean again.

Don't you get it, Doitle? That $1 could have gone towards a pack of cigarettes for some poor guy on welfare. His cigarettes are far more important than the freedom of millions of Iraqis.

If freedom is something of importance (to you) in the Middle East, then tell me... Why have relations with Libya been reestablished lately?

Qaddafi was considered as a threat for quite a while, but it appears that ever since he sort of "opened himself" (by offering oil deals with countries, Unions (like the UN) and companies) to the Occident, that stuff no longer matters!

His government is still oppressing his people, and the money he's getting from those oil deals isn't distributed to the citizens of the country but to people in his government and to himself.

Don't tell me you guys care about freedom in the rest of the world, it's just a question of global interests.

- - - - -

Asides from that, I have a few questions for you Hydra (and anyone else who would like to answer them).

Since your country import most of its oil from Canada, in your opinion, what impact would the nationalization of fossil combustibles (and I'm talking about a radical nationalization, meaning we'd stop to export them to the United States, Japan, Korea ... And the list goes on) and the leveling of the price of oil (let's say $20CDN/Barrel) would have with the relations between our countries?

Do you believe it would create some sort of exile among the Americans (companies/industries + population)(non-patriotic) who live in the northern states (could be anywhere too).

Do you think that people from Europe would immigrate here just to pay less to live?

Finally, do you think that this politic of isolation would be successful?

America doesn't get most of its oil from Canada, actually.
I believe they get most from over the pond. Canada was something like the 3rd highest exporter to the U.S.

Javacx: Well... I don't know what to say.

Msgtpain: I actually asked myself these questions after hearing an economist saying that the refiners were making "outrageous profits" and that we "sold our resources to foreign interest (the government sold what it had left in Petro-Canada).

I'm not a stupid kid, I'm able to answer such questions by myself, I'm just curious to know your answers (I'm also able to generate my own opinion on political subjects and such, unlike a certain "SFE").
