No, it's 'this'. I'm positive.

Cambridge may be right on most things, but they're mostly full of shit on this one.

Could it be a voice clip that wasn't change? Perhaps Hotwire was initially going to be male?

Edit: I'm sure as we are all well aware after how Grand Theft Auto made the news, that game developers don't always remove stuff that is cut from the playable version.

Slightly off topic though, but there was never a study at Cambridge on this.

It does appear that Cambridge has nothing to do with that sentence. Type in "Aoccdnrig to a rscheearch" to a search engine, page after page not one link to this research topic on <http://www.cambridge.org>, or any other site.

Also a search of <http://www.cambridge.org> doesn't bring forth any articles.

I think he just uses the signature to account for his grammar and spelling.

That paragraph has been around for bloody ages.

Most forums I've been in have it dragged up every now and again, its true and amusing so it keeps popping up, the cambridge bit is part of it whether cambridge really was the source or not...

Since I live in cambridge (yes the real ENGLISH cambridge) I could walk onto (some part of) the university campus and do a 5 minute study on the length of uni students hair and truthfully say it was a study from cambridge university...

I can't care less where studies are made as long as they sound logical in the end.

That article really isn't all that true. Try it with more confusing words, yet common. You'll find it's not all that easy.

No, he says 'this'. Even if I'm wrong, though, we've noted that it's the accent that gets you.

Listen to the following file, and you'll see that he said "this" not "his".
