I hope England kicks Sweden's ass next week...then T&T just has to beat a demoralized Paraguay in order to advance to the next round. That would be so awesome...

Just biting something in the rear end before it comes up:

Yes, he called it football.

No, he does not mean American-style football

Yes, he's talking about what we call soccer.

I find it funny that a country can't stop a war because thousands of innocent civilians are dying but they can because they are hosting a fucking soccer game.

Small error in my original post, it isn't because they(Ivory Coast) are hosting but just because they fucking qualified.

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/06/16/AR2006060201401.html>

A small snippet of the article:

Quote:The World Cup is coming, which means a flurry of desperate attempts by tournament promoters to excite Americans about an event that electrifies the rest of the world. This year is no different. ESPN, which will broadcast most of the games in the United States, is airing a series of ads with members of the rock band U2. In one, Bono says that the World Cup "closes the schools, closes the shops, closes a city and stops a war."

If stopping a war seems like an exaggeration, another ad explains soccer's peace-building qualities in more detail: "After three years of civil war, feuding factions talked for the first time in years, and the president called a truce. Because the Ivory Coast qualified for the World Cup for the first time. Because, as everyone knows, a country united makes for better cheerleaders than a country divided."

You couldn't come up with anything else so you insulted something that had no base in this conversation. Then you try and imply that Jake is homosexual when I am pretty sure that I remember seeing his girlfriend.
