Okay here's the summary. This judge who visited a certain small dry-cleaner business had his pants lost 3 times. Yeah that sucks but the owners offered to pay for his pants but he refused.

He is suing them for 67 Million dollars!

He also wants $500,000 in emotional damages (yeah right).

He also wants $542, 500 in legal fees, even though he is representing himself in court!

He wants $15,000 for 10 years worth of weekend car rentals (supposedly to drive his pants to a different shop).

Quote:the Chungs offered Pearson $3,000 in compensation.

No dice.

Then they offered him $4,600.

No dice.

Finally, they offered $12,000 for the missing gray trousers with the red and blue stripes.

Pearson said no.

The judge went to the lawbooks. Citing the District of Columbia's consumer protection laws, he claims he is entitled to $1,500 per violation. Per day.

So not only is the Judge totally fucking these guys over, but since he is a "judge", the court is not throwing it out. People try dumbass attempts like this to sue people all the time, but they get thrown out as "frivolous lawsuits", which translates to "Don't waste our time with stupid and/or ridiculous lawsuits".

Yeah it sucks that his pants were lost 3 times. But if the service was so bad why did he keep going back? Why didn't he accept their offer to pay for his pants?

In my opinion this guy is a dick and if I saw him I would take a shit right in his pants pocket.

What's wrong? If anything, this judge just calculated ahead to compensate for upcoming inflation of the dollar. Also, the emotional damage suffered by the loss of pants is near impossible to describe in money. You are all haters!

Well, at least one Judge that he's gone before had done that.

He tried to make it a class-action, but was denied... and insulted in the process (well, as much as any Judge can insult him in the scope of his decision making)

Sounds staged and premeditated.

Anyone with half a brain won't give him that much for his 'troubles' -- especially since they offered compensation up front, anyway.

Here's an example of a "frivolous lawsuit" that just happened, and was thrown out because of its foolishness. Yet mister whiney pants above gets to waste everyones time with his lawsuit, or even worse he could win and totally ruin the lives of the owners of the drycleaning business.

<http://www.cnn.com/2007/LAW/05/02/kfc.suit.ap/index.html>

I still want to take a dump on his pants.

While I agree that it is hilarious, this lawsuit does have a valid legal basis to it (though the expected outcome is completely ridiculous), which is why it hasn't been thrown out... yet.

Had he been suing for the cost of the lost item(s) only, I doubt anyone would be complaining.

The KFC one had no legal basis as the doctor could not show he was harmed by it.

The sheer amount that this fucker is asking for should be grounds for dismissal all on its own. There's no way anybody deserves $67 million for a pair of fucking pants. Neither is there any way that anyone deserves $500,000 for "emotional damages" because they lost a pair of fucking pants. For that matter, anybody who asks for the compensation of legal fees to the tune of $542,500 when they are representing their own sick, malicious ass ought to be drawn and quartered. Hell, anyone who sues for $15,000 for car rentals so they can drive to a different business is outta their gourd, too. The judge ought to see this for what it is: a malicious prick exploiting the legal system in a pathetic attempt to retire early on somebody else's hard earned money. That is what makes this suit frivolous.

It may have legal grounds- but if something this obscenely outlandish is legal, doesn't that show a glaring flaw in our legal system that needs to be fixed right fucking now?

Unfortunately, costs are subjective (for the most part), and have nothing to do with the legality of the case itself... which is what the court must hear out.

That's not to say that should he win that he'll get what he asks for, but as far as the law is concerned, he was harmed by the act he claimed happened and there is a valid reason for the claim. In order for it to be heard in court, that's really all that is required.

The damages claimed, though, could cause him problems if he doesn't get a sympathetic judge. He may even be awarded less that what the defendants offered him.

However, it is America. And while I don't intend this as an insult, its legal system is known for giving substantially large awards than would be normal elsewhere.

Not to mention that even if the drycleaning business owners sold or mortgaged everything that their family owns for 3 generations, and spends the rest of them and their grandchildrens lives giving 100% of their income, he would be lucky to get a million bucks much less 67 mil.

But he would get it from the stores insurance policy. Though in the end this will either get thrown out or be reduced so much that it might as well have been thrown out.

Doesn't mean they can try to charge for racism. Considering they already admitted that the items of clothing were lost, and as business owners are liable, they have no recourse as far as "racism" goes, simply because of the circumstances surrounding the case. Had the judge never lost any pairs of clothing at the drycleaners, and was bringing this to court with no basis, then perhaps they would have something there.

Even if that were the case, you still have to prove it.

Unless he were to make comments suggesting race is an issue, you never could prove it.

As I said before, despite the outrageous damages claimed, he has a very valid case.

As such, my point stands, there is no basis for a racism claim.

I saw on T.V that a teacher got arrested for punishing a "black" child. Nothing racist came into this either.

One thing i do hate is the racist association with "n1gger", all it means is a native American i believe.

Not bumping an old topic...this fuckhole actually got his day(s) in court!

<http://www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,281473,00.html>

Some LOL moments from the trial:

dumbest lawsuit ever

Pearson, who represented himself, proceeded to call some eight witnesses that included his 38-year-old son and some members of the community who had had bad experiences with Custom Dry Cleaners, including an 89-year-old woman in a wheelchair who drifted at times into her service in the Kennedy-Johnson administration.

This witness, Dr. Grace Hewell, was certainly entertaining when she noted that she was "chased" out of the store by Mr. Chung, which she then slid into comparing to "surviving the Nazis" while she was stationed in Germany in World War II.

When Pearson testified as himself — a narrative that lasted for more than an hour — he broke down and cried and asked for a recess. The breakdown occurred right after he described being told that the Chungs "did not have his pants" that he so desperately needed to start his new job as a judge in 2005.

Some other color to note — a man in a seersucker suit from the American Tort Reform Association handed out green buttons with a picture of pants on them that read: "$65 Million Pantsuit Perverts D.C.'s Consumer Protection Law."

Seriously...this guy is wasting taxpayer money to have a week long trial, that would never ever be allowed except for the fact that he is a judge. He had just become a judge too, so I guess the good ole boy club let's people in early now.

Probably because of the negative publicity that the business got following this ahole Pearson's money-scheming ploy.

Many customers would be turned off by the whole thing...to the Chungs, the whole incident will be like a stubborn piece of sh*t that refuses to flush away. It's gonna stay with them and their business forever.
