15,000 RPM HARD DRIVE! DAMN! That has to be one fast motherfucker!

You would load renegade maps so freakin fast lol!

Actually, a 15,000 RPM hard drive would perform slower than a 10,000 drive in those circumstances. A 15k drive has faster seek times yes, but because of how desktop access patterns are, having a drive like that wouldn't benefit a gaming system. They are suited for servers.

Western Digital Raptor harddisks with 10.000 rpm are indeed the worlds fastest HDDs for desktop PCs atm heh, I still have 1 sec loadtime in Ren and no I do not have Raid0 or anything else, only the first map = slow load, but I have seen a Raid0 Config with Ren, and Ren still loads slow on the first load so..

512MB - swap = off

Scripts.dll

I load any map within 2 seconds.

Basically, SCSI is not meant for desktop use. If you ever consider a 15k drive for your desktop, get a 10'000 RPM and DON'T get a 15k.

Ok. I didn't want one anyway.

I got a 7200RPM drive and thats good enough for me!

WESTERN DIGITAL FTW!

250GB I hardly use 50...

I filled up my 200GB almost completely... but it's extremely unorganized and filled with raw NTSC video.

I had 3 of those exact hard drives in my PC for over a year. I just recently replaced them with 300GB SATA2 drives, and I can tell you that I really notice and miss the speed, but one thing I do not miss is the noise. Those drives were loud as hell - not just the whine of the drive motors as the platters were spinning, but you could actually hear the heads moving quite loudly.

They are very fast though and I could load renegade maps in under a second. If not for the noise reduction that I am enjoying, I would put them and my SCSI card back into my machine.

They are server-class drives though and not meant for "home" PC use.

Heh I didn't buy them myself, they were spares from work. I probably won't sell the 3 that I was using, as they have all my data on them, and I might put them back in when I rebuild my PC. I will see if I have any others to spare though.
