All that'll happen now is some bright spark will write a program that encrypts everything so well that Audible Magic can't detect it.

Then the RIAA will produce something that stops that, then the 1337 will produce something that circumvents that.

It's a neverending cycle that the RIAA can't win.

Actually it's not my ISP and they're going to a higher court now so it might take a couple of years longer . And an encrypted torrent (say SSL) will bypass the detection easily. But it's the principle... They can take away a part of my Internet .

Sounds like anything that the makers don't want bypassed.

Ontopic - The ISP's should not have to "fight" piracy (presumably, one "fights" piracy by employing ninjas...). If a company wants whatever it's making to be kept private, don't go near the internet.

Oh... and... ... Thugs at the RIAA...
