I won't write any more threads for a while and I take back anything I said that may of hurt someone's feelings. I will still once in a while post replies to other people's threads, but I won't make many of my own from now on. Sorry for the inconvenience. Bye!

That's what everybody asked of you in the first place, and you're contradicting it by posting another thread.

Whatever. We don't want you to stop posting or anything, it's just the first couple days you were here you made like 1000 threads about stuff that about everybody knows.

Errr...

Nobody's saying that you shouldn't make threads. We just don't need to see 11 threads made in a short period of time, especially when most can be condensed into one. If you have a question that can't be answered simply by a Google search, or it's completely unrelated to another thread, go ahead and post it. Though, try to add more than one sentence to the posts, too.

Remember, quality over quantity.

I was making a lot of threads because it was the first time I ever joined a forum and I was so excited! By the way, if the things I post everybody knows, then what should I post? (later on I mean)

CarrierII wrote on Tue, 15 July 2008 15:00 Right. The next forum feature: The edit button. It's on the bottom right of your posts, you can change what you typed with it, that means you don't have to double post (posting after yourself, it's frowned upon just about everywhere). Smile

How do you copy the person's quote without having to write it all over again (without double posting)?

P.S. I didn't double post, but I want to know if there is an easier way without having to write the whole thing all over again.

Thanks for the info, but if you put too many questions in one thread, people might not reply to it.

I'm sure he'll get better with time. It's kinda like raising a forum puppy. Unless we want to close new registration we will have to just deal with some hiccups now and again from new people. JoeBro I might also suggest you check out the spam forum as people wont care about triple, quadruple. Any kind of ridiculous posting really in there. You could learn how to work the forum better in there without evoking as much rage. I'm sure you could pretty easily participate in the thrilling topics in there like. Post an Elephant and I'm sure something to do with Plecostomous.

I know exactly how you felt. I did the same thing at noobless when I first started. 100 posts in 1 month was something to frown on there, because apparently people don't post much. You'll learn the posting styles here. gl.

you seem like the only one who understands what I'm going through. I mean what's wrong about posting a lot of threads about important information people need to know?

1. It's not important information at all. Half of it is common sense. I don't mean to be rude, but it's true.

2. You just double posted again. 1/10 points for effort.
