Well here's the story, I've been coughing everyday for a year. After getting over the flu last summer my cough never went away. I've been getting made fun of in school and even people asking me about it and such on the streets. I have had,

-2 TB test

-2 X rays

-One cat scan

-2 blood test (one is allergies which is negative)

-Taken some asma meds and nothing

-Taken 2 prescription 7 day anti biotic pills

-Taken some addictive liquid medicine

All is negitve or did not work

So no one knows what it is

Maybe someone here can give me some advice and help me. I've had this for a year or more and im sick of getting mad fun of and running out of options.

Here's an idea: WebMD.com

You usually post really inane stuff that most people here really don't care about or aren't qualified to answer. Seeing as how the likelihood of any of us being doctors is close to nil, I'd take the suggestion I gave you and try webMD.com. Barring that, use Google and search for answers. It might take less time out of your day and you're less likely to post things here that are completely and totally irrelevant.

That said, I sympathize with you because I have phlegm in my throat for a while after I'm sick and I cough a lot because of it.

Maybe it's dust from the PC, if you spend allot of time on the computer at your home, and it's in a poorly ventilated area with an old PC, then possibly the dust inside might be causing your irritated throat. Maybe

Just throwing this out there...

Has there ever been a time that you might have inhaled something organic by accident? Small grass blade, any kind of wood particle, any kind of organic debris? If I remember right, plant/wood/hair, etc doesn't typically show up on cat-scans/x-rays. Least not on the lungs. But I dunno. I haven't had any kind of anatomy/biology class since I was 12. :S

I've heard that there was a girl with really bad breath most of her life, but tests proved nothing. Had her lungs checked and they found a needle from a christmas pine she had accidentally inhaled years ago. Was still green.

Then again, you said this was the result of a flu, so that's just that much more improbable. :shrug:

Maybe try taking some Allegra or Claritin to see if it might be an allergy to something in your home (dust, mold, pet, etc).

Also you can try Mucinex (with lots lots lots of water) to clear out any phlegm that might be loose in your system causing the coughing.

I know we don't have pets, or dust (my mom is the cleanest neat freak in the whole fucking world, you can eat off your floors and toilets) and mold, I doubt it we live in apartments and they are new and nothing's been bad here they do yearly checks. As the rest will give it a try why not Believe it or not, when I was in 7th grade, I had the exact same problem. I got a minor cough one day and it just didn't go away. I would cough really hard every few minutes or when I got excited, I just couldn't shake it. My friends caught on eventually and started poking fun at me, but not like in a mean way.. more of from a joking standpoint.

Anyway, it lasted me for months and months. There was no reason for me to be coughing either. I didn't do anything to provoke it or anything. It started to stain my throat and it began to hurt really badly. However, oddly enough, after suffering through this intense cough for months on end, I had finally stopped when I had surgery done to remove a double hernia.

Don't ask me how, in any way, shape, or form, that my cough had to do with my hernia (other than maybe causing the hernia)... but once I had the surgery, the cough never returned to haunt me again.

That was just over 6 years ago. That's not to say I haven't gotten coughs every now and again since then, but I never went back into the violent one I was talking about earlier.

I don't know if that helps or not... I just thought I would share my experience on the matter.

no but got blood tested and said I have no allergies

I recommend getting a 'pin-prick' test. Basically, stick a bunch of needles into your back, each tipped with an allergen, and a gauge to measure swelling. I know, sounds fun, right? Was well worth it, though. I had no idea I was allergic to a type of fungus that grows in hay-bales, and they were all around our property.

However, there is another possibility. Could be Reactive Airway Disease. A severe flu might have intensified it; even if it was never a problem before. Hope that isn't the case. If it is, it may also be aggravated by chlorine.

Anyone else notice his thread is getting kinda 'House-y?' Bah, sorry. Lost the serious.

Oh, was also told that if you by any chance live in a trailer, might be irritations due to formaldehyde (really?).

I have a problem myself that doctors can't seem to figure out what it is, but it's related to heat. I'll save the time of not posting it since it has nothing to do with the coughing. But maybe you just have something so rare that only 1 in 1 billion people get later in time? Because I only started getting my issue when I was around 12 years old, and I still have it but the effects of it are not as much as they use to.

I don't know. But one thing, when you cough, before the actual cough, do you feel a tickling feeling in your throat and then it forces you to cough out?

Is it smokey in the room when you go to sleep?
smokey no just smell it a lil once in a while but i cant run from it

Test it: go live for a few days at a non smoker's house. Or get your parent(s) to stop smoking...

If possible I would talk to psychologist. Anxiety and panic attacks can cause various respiratory problems. I have been having anxiety attacks for years and I used to just think that I had a breathing problem.
