I'm less annoyed by the rickroll than how much effort I had to waste to get to it. I fucking never use IE :[

Looks the same in my IE as it does in chrome. A really pixelated image that says something about "security."

What'd you do to IE to make it not be insecure, then? It's supposed to be just a lame image in GOOD, secure browsers, but in my IE (and as is the intention), it's one of those stupid rickroll pages that moves about the screen.

Have you updated your IE any time recently?

Used IE tab in FF, some text appeared (code?) and then redirected me to a rickroll page.

I just tried it with a fully updated IE installation and the malformed image redirected me to a rick-roll page. Not bad, but it can't get particularly harmful because I have UAC on I'm using version 8.0.6001.18241 (Or just Beta 2 of version 8). I think they've already come out with a release candidate for version 8 though.

Edit: Updated my IE to the RC1 version... still no bug.

This is why I've disabled certain Javascript abilities in Firefox.

It doesn't work in firefox, the developers of ie are just mentally retarded. You should have NoScript on all the time though.

No, I just go into the Advanced options in FF for Javascript, and I've unchecked all the options, including the one that allows resizing and moving windows.
