From Battlestar Wiki:

"The Kodiak, the command ship of the Global Defence Initiative (GDI) faction from the computer game Command & Conquer: Tiberian Sun is seen among the fleet in one establishing shot."

Now you tell me that Westwood's C&C hasn't had an impact on Science Fiction.....

I been so liking that show ever since I saw the commercials for it WAY back in 2003. It's been an awesome show and we will never see such a show like it for quite some time.

I agree

I have watched this show since release and never missed an episode.
I have never been captivated by the story like anything else.

It's not the first time a ship from another sci-fi universe has made its way into BSG... this is pretty cool, though. I hadn't caught it when I saw the episode.

I didn't like the latter two seasons as much as I liked the first two. I was probably just in a bad mindset for them.

I'll watch the series again some day. heh.

What great music to end the series with.

I think that Season 3 was the weakest overall. the first 4 or so and the last ~5 were ok, but the rest of season 3 was basically just killing time without advancing plot OR character.

so say we all. wrote on Mon, 30 March 2009 05:25I think that Season 3 was the weakest overall. the first 4 or so and the last ~5 were ok, but the rest of season 3 was basically just killing time without advancing plot OR character.

The series went down after the second season. The producers lost the plot and decided to make new storylines as they went along.

The ending left behind far too many unanswered questions and incomplete sub-plots. It was a quick way out and the show could not have had another season because they managed to squeeze everything they can out of it and were basically running on fumes in the final season.

But I think it was not THAT bad of an ending. And it was a damn good show despite it's [few] shortcomings.
