If you're not comfortable with repeating whatever it is you're saying, you shouldn't put it out on the internet in public.

This is hardly a hot topic. Spam Fest would be most appropriate.

No, I'd say it's very reasonable and rational for an employer, school, or agency to view your

As someone else said, if you're ok to say something on facebook publicly; then why can you not say it in person and still suffer the consequences.

you obviously have a public profile right? If you want to say shit that will most likely get you in trouble, you best do it in private.

Only thing you can do now is to face the music and make better choices from now onwards.

If they post on FB about cutting class or spray painting the bathroom during internetz101 then yes they school should use it. How ever if they post that saturday night they went to nikki6's, dropped acid, had a all dude gang bang, got AIDS, bumped 3 year old threads, over dosed, and listened to Justin Bieber all night then no it is none of their damn business.

School (and employeers) have no grounds to worry about what you are doing beyound the time you owe them. It isn't their right and it sure as hell isn't their place.

What if n00bstories banned a person because they posted on FB that they got a speeding ticket for going 69 in a 25? That wouldn't make much sense now would it? How ever if some one posted SS of cheating in Renegade on FB them we would lay teh bant down.

yea it's perfectly acceptable. Saying something online in a public social website is like talking out loud in public. Badmouthing the school on facebook is no different than saying it in public... except for the fact that what you say is archived on facebook.

It's your personal expression, therefore it represents you. If you say something that is damaging to your person, then it's your own fault if the wrong people see it.

You chose to put your information on a public website. By doing that, you made it the school's (and anyone else who happens to read it) business. Therefore you have to deal with the consequences. Even if what you put up online has nothing to do with the school; you made it their business by making the information public.

If the person in question got a speeding ticket, then they've recieved their punishment already. Besides, traffic offences are a morally-neutral crime. We don't consider speeders to be wicked horrible people, do we?

What if somebody posted pictures of their shrine to your nipple pic of Facebook? Pretty fucking creepy, and I wouldn't be surprised to see n00bstories removing such an individual. These kinds of things reveal the content of a person's character, and that's really what's at stake here, not the amount of pot some dumb 14 year old has smoked.

There is a line between what should and shouldn't be done after receiving some information on someone.

For example, if a kid posts on their facebook page that they went to a party and did drugs, it's then in the school's best interest to follow up on that information. However, it is not their place to take that facebook post as a confession and suspend/expel them from school.

If you start blocking/banning/restricting things from people just because you assume they can't handle it or don't deserve it based on some public info, then that is something I disagree with. You're punishing for thought crimes and that's just wrong.

If someone is a cheater in one game, they should not be banned from another game unless they cheat there too. You punish someone for breaking a rule only after they have actually broken it... not before. (Unless in some rare situations where it's possible to pin someone on a crime before it happens.)

I didn't think I would have to explain it to you, but they don't care what grade you're in, or how many weeks into the school year it is. It's not like they're going to be like

- 1) "Sir! We just found out one of our students smokes pot!"
- 2) "Hmmm...but it's already four weeks into the school year. Is it a 9th grader?"
- 1) "Uhm...no..."
- 2) "Well then forget it. Don't do anything about it"

You can be put in jail if you're caught possessing it. Having it in your system is a different story.

edit: I know this sounds pretty stupid, but the punishments for the two are very different.
they let me go just because i wasnt possessing it so you are in the clear? Good to know.

yeah, just stay clear of anything that gets you into trouble with the law (even if you disagree with it).

yet again why would they search out of nowhere... thats pointless time wasteing to search 900+ kids names at random...

Two things:

1. How do you know they just deiced to randomly look up your name? What if they just happened to stumble upon it? Facebook is a web of links to other people. The more friends you have (and the more friends they have, and so on) the more likely someone is going to stumble onto your page.

What if one of the parents of your friends (or friend's friend) stumbled onto your page and then reported it to the school?

There are literally hundreds of different ways and scenarios that could have led to the discovery of your FB page.

2. How they found it or why they found it really shouldn't matter. The fact is: they found it. Knowing the reasoning behind it is not going to somehow get you off the hook. Once again, it's a public website. Access is granted to everyone. You don't have to be a spy to be able to learn about someone from FB.

I mean, unless the person who found your page broke into your house and read it off of your computer, you cannot fault them for breaking any privacy laws or anything.

Also, the fact you keep implicitly suggesting that your school has no social responsibility to ensure you grow up with a working moral compass is a reason in itself for them to keep an eye on you...

TL;DR: It's their job to look after you! In loco parentis, anyone?

It will probably be noted in your school record. So better stay clear until you graduate, tbh.

We can only hope, but of course you're right. Some people never learn.

Okay, if you are going to be talking about shit that can actually get you in trouble you should at least not do it under your real name, its common sense. I say the school has the right to get at certain information, especially if it's as easily accessible as a public post on Facebook (now whether or not it's a good use of their time and civilian tax dollars (searching Facebook posts) is another topic all together).
