I think it's amusing knowing that when I die one day (probably in a drive-by shooting) that, among other things, i'm going to be leaving behind meaningless posts on the renegade forums. There are others who have died and it's always surreal to see their left-behind forum posts and all that. Can you name or remember any players who have died irl that played renegade?

I vaguely recall someone named Trey/dom dying when I was first playing renegade, and I was essentially a little kid then and remember how weird it was realizing someone had died from ren.

Anyone else?

edit: some others i remember now:

nfekti0n (spelling?)

Gunny

Spoonplex and HTGunny are the only ones I can remember. I know there are others but they don't pop into my head at the moment, sadly...

Edit: techman06 is another I remember. I believe he comitted suicide. It sucks thinking about this stuff, but I guess you would never think people who play ren would just suddenly not come back online anymore.

The problem is a lot of people may have died over the years and there has been no communication of it to the communities that the people belonged too.

I know that if I got hit by a bus tomorrow and died my family wouldn't even think to let people on renegade know haha.

Ya there was this whole thing at this old community called "LTROUSH CTF" and there was a siggy made in her memory and a lot of us used it. It's been over 4 years now I believe since her passing. Died of cancer. Young age too, I think 23? Can't remember exactly.

Thats illogical, if that were the case then WoW would be out of players by now

But seriously, to think someone could die of cancer at age 23, thats horrible.

this one is pretty sad:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Video_game_addiction#South_Korea humans are social creatures and video game addiction take people away from their social life (at least partially), and this causes an abnormality which could result in an instant and unexpected death.

I have not heard anyone that I personally came across through Renegade or any other online game or forum has passed away.

But I have certainly read a lot of threads and heard a lot of others talk about players that have passed. Mainly Spoonplex from Jelly. From what I have read, I would definitely say you need to retract your troll statement, and probably just keep quiet.

If there were any decency in you, you would apologize... actually if there were any in you, you would not have made such a statement in the first place.

Sadly, it is the trolls that seem not to die. Maybe they do, but nobody misses them. The people mentioned in this thread by others may have not have been the best players, but I am sure they were still worth more than you.

You seek attention while you are alive, maybe you already know when your time comes... nobody will care, or miss you. Kinda sad to be jealous of people who have passed.

Nowhere in this thread do I disrespect the dead, Carrier. Only Archerman. Unless he's keeled over in the meantime, I don't see the connection. Aside from the posts being loaded on the same page, which is trivial at best. You might as well call a bar that opens on the same street as a graveyard a disrespect to the dead, despite not involving them in any way.

Show some fucking respect and not derail every single thread for your stupid prejudice. You're worse than John Doe for saying that, even.

I shouldn't have to tell you that I never actually wrote "I have no respect for the mourning", and that was just Glock thinking he's being clever with editing quotes, right?

The quoted post had been edited, so I assumed you'd since removed the line quoted. My mistake.

Hero was shipped off to the middle east a year or so back (Air Force or Navy can't remember) and still no word from him even though he said he would have access to internet.

For those of you who don't know he made that Hero's Pro Circuit Race Map...among others.

people like to say suicide is selfish because it hurts the feelings of those who lose the ones they care about maybe it's selfish asking someone suffering enough to want to end their lives to stick around just to make those people feel better, i don't know

Because no matter your issue there's always help for every instance no matter how serious. You kill yourself and it leaves your family and friends wondering that maybe they could have helped you and then that evolves into those people ending up blaming themselves for not being more active in said persons life.

When you walk into your lifetime friends room and see him hanging from a rope you'll know what I know.

Of course not, but what the US does so well that Turkey utterly fails at is admitting their mistakes. We know our slavery phase was wrong and we can own up to it. We can look back on our imperialism phase and have a meaningful discussion on the negatives. Turkey, on the other hand still wants to pretend that the Armenian genocide never happened, that the Janissarys were all volunteers. It's like having a country full of halocaust deniers.

Every nation, almost without exception, has some historical skeletons in their closet that they're not proud of. It's how you deal with them afterwards that reveals character.

Only some of the intellectuals (of which, there aren't many of). Most people just feel "white guilt" about it, but don't really own up to it.

Dover wrote on Sat, 27 November 2010 23:55 We can look back on our imperialism phase and have a meaningful discussion on the negatives.

A lot of the US, if asked what their opinion on slavery was, would say "Slavery was BAD and it should have NEVER happened". I don't think anyone actually gets WHY it's bad; they just say it's bad. They're not wrong, but they're hardly capable of having a "meaningful discussion".

Dover wrote on Sat, 27 November 2010 23:55 Every nation, almost without exception, has some historical skeletons in their closet that they're not proud of. It's how you deal with them afterwards that reveals character.

It's not like the US has dealt with its problems very well, either. If you try and actually discuss why slavery was bad, all you can do is preach to the choir. "Slavery was so stupid, man!" etc, unless you want to be labeled as a racist and a slave driver.

I don't really call that a meaningful discussion.

I know this will be a sensitive subject, but what about Iraq? I have never heard an American official say that they were really wrong in invading Iraq.

They might have admitted that the reason (WMD's) might have been wrong, but then they claim it was for freedom and what not more. I could believe that, if the USA didn't have such a record of working with dictators that liked the USA.

Oh, and then the bodies that came out of the wikileaks closet... Afaik the USA has been hammering on the fact that the leaks are illegal, and not providing excuses for the wrongdoings described in them.

Now, I'm not saying the Netherlands (or the EU for that matter) is a lot better, perhaps it is, perhaps it's not. But I think it's wrong to blame countries for their stubbornness not to admit their mistakes, as there are virtually no countries that are willing to go that way, all the way. If one does, that country should be praised, if one does not, then I guess that's pretty much human nature.

How did we get slavery and Iraq out of dead Renegade players?

Anyway, I feel no "white" guilt about slavery, nor reverse racism towards blacks. Any idea why? I don't own slaves. My family didn't own slaves. They were jewelers from Germany who came here to branch out a business.

Protip: For added rage, when someone pulls the race card or otherwise guilts you on your ancestors, tell them "your forefathers didn't have the qualifications my forefathers were looking for."

There's a fine but meaningful line between "Slavery was wrong and should never have happened" and "Slavery never happened". I would see a Turk saying "The Batak masacare was wrong and should never have happened" as a step in the right direction.
