Nothing new, open source has been around for a while now. It's just that it being bought to the medias attention that we hear about it. Last case like this was HP installing Star Office on there systems they sell to the public rather than before using Microsoft office. I wouldn't say it's big news because it's being going on over the past few years now.

When Linux becomes user-friendly enough (I CANNOT say idiot-proof, because no matter how idiot-proof you make something, there will always be an idiot to prove you wrong) to become commonplace, ie: easily accessible drivers, simple installation etc. THEN MS will be in trouble.
