HomeyIt's the internet, who cares?

I don't understand that logic. The internet isn't separate from everything else in life, it's just another medium for communicating with people. Sure, you might never come into face-to-face contact with the people you meet online, but I don't see why that makes it ok to treat them badly. Is the possibility of physical confrontation the only reason that you would have respect for another person's feelings in "real life"? Or do you actually have some kind of empathy for other people? If it's the latter, then why doesn't that apply to people you talk to on the internet? They still have feelings the last time I checked.

With a lot of people, I suspect it's the former.

If you were to call me a dumbass lets say, why should I care? You don't know me or anything about me. I think people care too much about other peoples opinions over the internet. I think the internet is some peoples way to vent their anger. Which is why there is so many flame wars

I agree that it is a place to vent, but when someone is being an idiot and continues to do so and gets mad at suggestions then it's where people get mad back. Immaturity, to an extent, does play a part as well.

1. It has never lagged or froze up for me, it works just fine and my computer isn't the best and most 1337!

2. If you don't have it you need to get it to prevent cheating, otherwise you would wine and complain everytime you think someone is cheating because they are better than you.

3. If you have an internet connection which you do have, since you are able to play online in games and make a reply in this topic, you can download it. Just start it before you go to bed and when you wake up it should be done, hopefully.

4. Why are you complaining if your computer rocks?

No, I don't know. It's quite stable.

As of this moment, there have been 3960 successful installs of RenGuard. You're only going to hear about the people who have problems, and the percentage of them is VERY small.
